Brooklyn Museum

March 25, 2015

25 notes

Our 2015 Brooklyn Artists Ball will once again feature artist-created immersive table environments. However, unlike years past which tapped a new crop of artists each time, the gala's fifth incarnation welcomes back eight previous participants to create larger scale installations for this year's festivities. We will be spotlighting each of these artists over the next few weeks.

Jen Catron and Paul Outlaw are a Brooklyn-based artistic duo whose collaborative projects are changing the way the world looks at performance art. Their performances and often large-scale installations explore various aspects our culture—whether it's economic disparity, cultural fame, or artistic worth—while simultaneously celebrating and criticizing. Whether they're incorporating hot air balloons, conducting art world souvenir bus tours, or serving crawfish out of their fish fry truck, their projects poke fun at both the art world and themselves.

Having also participated in the 2013 #BKArtistsBall, Catron and Outlaw will return with another celebratory and interactive experience offering bizarre entertainment in the form of art happenings. Their pieces will create a unique and changing environment while telling an odd story throughout the evening. We look forward to—once again—falling into their world and participating in all the revelry
